

City Limits

Images of Boston in Transition

Photographs by
Roswell Angier,
Polly Brown, Bill Burke,
Kelly Wise

Foreword to the 1987 edition
by Robert Coles

New foreword by B. D. Colen

City Limits

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Boston skyline from a rooftop on Cedar Street

CITY LIMITS

Images of Boston in Transition

Photographs by Roswell Angier
 Polly Brown
 Bill Burke
 Kelly Wise

Edited by Kelly Wise

Foreword by Robert Coles

Northeastern University Press Boston

Northeastern University Press

Copyright © 1987 by Roswell Angier, Polly Brown, Bill Burke, and
Kelly Wise

New foreword © 2019 by B. D. Colen.

Open access edition funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities/Andrew W. Mellon Foundation
Humanities Open Book Program.

The text of this book is licensed under a Creative Commons
Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International License:
creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/4.0/

ISBN 978-1-55553-873-6

Designed by Carl Zahn.

Composed in Serifa by DEKR Corporation, Woburn, Massachusetts.

Cover design for the Humanities Open Book edition by THINK Book Works.

Contents

Foreword to the Humanities Open Book Edition vii

Acknowledgments ix

Foreword by Robert Coles xi

Introduction by Kelly Wise xiii

The Photographs

1
Beacon Hill, Dorchester, East Boston, West Roxbury 1

2
Charlestown, North End, Roslindale, Roxbury 37

3
Chinatown, Hyde Park, South Boston, South End, Readville 75

4
Back Bay, Brighton/Allston, Jamaica Plain, Mattapan 111

Foreword to the Humanities Open Book Edition

When City Limits: Images of Boston in Transition was first published in 1987, it doubtless introduced many of its readers to communities in their city about which they knew next to nothing. For almost since its founding, Boston has been more a collection of insulated, isolated city states, sharing a government and little else, rather than a unified whole. Every school child used to know that the Lowells spoke only to the Cabots, and the Cabots spoke only to God, but there was little discussion of the fact that the Irish of Southie knew next to nothing of the African Americans of Dorchester, and the Italians of the North End neither knew about, nor cared to know about, those living in the rest of the city's many ethnic enclaves. In the pages of this book, however, four legends of Boston photography—Bill Burke, Roswell Angier, Polly Brown, and Kelly Wise—used their singular visions and photographic skills to bring Bostonians images that captured the varied lives lived in many of the city's neighborhoods.

"Unique" is a term that is uniquely overused, suggesting as it does that the thing being described truly is one of a kind. But City Limits, in its photographic examination of a socio-economic and racial cross-section of Bostonians in the 1980s, may just be unique among books of photography. Because what other such collections of urban photography can we think of that seem as painfully relevant today as they did almost 40 years ago, at the moment the contributing photographers froze split seconds in time?

I come to this fascinating collection of photos after having spent 23 years living—and photographing—in metro Boston. And these photos remind me of two specific things that occurred shortly after I arrived in the city in 1993. The first was co-workers telling me that I couldn't possibly hope to understand the reality of the city without reading Common Ground, Anthony J. Lukas's Pulitzer Prize-winning exposition of the city's busing crisis of the 1970s and the racial realities that made that crisis inevitable. The second thing was an evening after work spent on the MBTA's Green Line, trying to get a bit of a feel for Boston. I rode the line to its Lechmere terminus, and on my trip back into downtown, the train stopped at the "Gahden" just after the end of a hockey game. The doors opened, and "Bru'ns" fans poured into the car. Leading the charge was a gaggle of young, white women, sporting towering beehive hairdos and leather jackets more common 30 years earlier. One of them openly hurled a racial epithet at her friend and dissolved in a braying laugh. Where, I wondered, after that jarring evening on the Green Line, was I living? Where was the Boston celebrated in so many novels and history books?

During my time in Boston it became painfully obvious that the photographers whose work constitutes City Limits not only captured the city as it existed in that moment of time in the early 1980s, they also captured the city as it would exist out of that past and into the present; the residents of neighborhoods changed, but the ugly truths of the isolation of those neighborhoods remained essentially the same. That truth was driven home to me shortly before I left the city in 2016, and was going through the images that make up a decade-long photo project in which I documented MBTA riders on the Green and Red Lines, from Brookline to Park Street on the Green Line, from Park Street on the Red Line to Harvard Square in the morning, and back in the opposite direction in the evening. With few exceptions, those photos show the Green Line ridership to be white and Asian, and generally well-to-do, while the Red Line carries a far more diverse group of riders, out of and back to neighborhoods in which most residents look and speak like the riders who leave and return to them.

None of this is to suggest that Boston is the only city like that reflected in these pages. But it is one of the few cities whose mythology suggests that it is somehow “special,” somehow better than the cities we know have populations divided by race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and, of course, class.

In some ways this digital reissuing of City Limits is even more important than its original publication. For its existence as a stop on the internet will make its outstanding photography—and the lessons those photographs impart—available to a far wider audience than the original book was. Hopefully, those seeing these photographs will realize that while they capture a time long past, they also reflect an ugly present—made even uglier by the fact that Boston is every day more a city of shockingly rich, and crushingly poor. And perhaps as viewers think about why that is true, at least some will be inspired try to effect real change.

B. D. COLLEN

Acknowledgments

We are indebted to the following:

Eelco Wolf, director of Worldwide Marketing Communications at Polaroid, and the Polaroid Corporation for generously funding the fieldwork of this project and the traveling exhibition, City Limits, and also for providing Polaroid equipment and materials. Throughout this project Eelco Wolf has offered helpful counsel and unqualified support.

Robert E. Stoller, patron of the arts, for his generous grant in support of the publication of City Limits.

During our work on this project, we were helped in many ways by various Bostonians and neighborhood institutions.

Our thanks go to: ABC Market, William Motley Ames, Ann Anzalone, John Ballard, Bob Barrett, Alex Bledsoe, Margaret Blood, Bob the Chef Restaurant, Boston Police Department (Area B and Area D), Marcia Brooks, A. J. Brown, Doña Candida, Pastor Stephen Chin, Tom Chung, Mary Ann Clevenger, Rose Colantuone, Vicki Collins, Francisco Colon, and the congregation of Asamblea Cristiana Pentecostal. Also to Father Thomas Conway, Christine Cooper, Dominic D'Ambrosio, Joe Delgado, Reverend Athanasios Demos, Amy Dominici, Kathryn Downing, Diane Edstrom, Linda Egleston, Ken Ehrlich, English High School, Lucy Ferullo, Norma Foley, Maria and Nick Foundas, Louis Froston, Pastor Jacob Fung, Andrea and Bruce Garr, Brad and Eugenie Gentry, Nick and Mary Georgenes, Charles Gibbons, Golden Palace Restaurant, Paul Grande, George Graney, Cebert Grant, Valerie Gregory, and the Grey family. And to Ed Hammond, Jock Harkness, Joseph Harris, Jr.,

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Horner, Karen Horton, Father Jeano, Michael Kane, Jonathan Kaufman, Nancy Keliher, Peggy Keyes, the Khalil Barber Shop, John Kiley, Tom King, Joe Lally, Suzanne Lee, Elma Lewis, Lorenzo's Market, Julian Low, and Madison Park High School.

Also to Father Daniel Mahoney, Edward Marino, Massachusetts Association for Minority Law Enforcement Officers, Walter McCarthy, Mary McGinnis, Metro Steel Orchestra, Mike's Doughnut Shop, Greg Miller, Richard Morrison, Reverend Don Nanstad, Sister Kathleen Natwin, Susan Ormsberg, Billy Owens, A. Parziale, Bob Perkins, Rabbi Perlmutter, Andrea Perreault, Larry Quealy, Barbara Rappaport, Jerry Riccio, Bertha Rojas, Sister Carole Rossi, Sister Nancy Rowen, Touch Sam, Judith Sanford-Harris, Rosemary Sansone, Edward Sawyer, Reverend Isaiah Sears, and Sefo el Brujo. And to Arthur Shirk of the International Institute, Bob Singleton of the Talk of the Town Barber Shop, Joyce Spadaro, Sister St. Agnes Spillane, St. Francis de Sales Church of Charlestown, Stonehedge Nursing Home, Neil Sullivan, the Very Reverend Gerard J. Szymkowiak, C.S.S.R., E. Alice Taylor, Dr. Winston Thompson, Grandmaster Kwong Tit-Fu, Margie Turner, The Twelfth Baptist Church, Lyn Wallace, John Walsh of the Irish Social Club, Alex Wan, Curtis Wells, Kay Whelan, Reverend Irvin Whitlow, Karen Williams and the Williams family, Elaine Wilson, Windsor Cricket Club, Bak Fun Wong, David Wong, Ken Yee, and Josephine Zizza.

Foreword

In 1973 my son (then nine) and I were spending time in several of Alaska's Eskimo communities near the Kobuk River. We were talking with Eskimo families, trying to learn how certain Eskimo children grew up and assumed their particular lives. We were listening to men and women speak of the Arctic tundra, of the cloudy sky that covers it for so many months of each year. We were looking at the drawings and paintings of Eskimo children, noting their decided interest in connecting the world around them (the land, the vegetation, the animal and fish life, the weather) to their personal world. We were learning; we were seeing with our eyes how a particular group of people living in a particular stretch of America conducted themselves in the course of their everyday lives.

As a child psychiatrist I was especially interested in what I heard—the various remarks, declarations, questions, statements of fact or fantasy spoken to a pair of visitors from (as it is so often put in Alaska) “the lower forty-eight.” However, I was at the time breaking in a new kind of tape recorder and having an exceedingly rough time doing so. Meanwhile, my son was having a fine, free time of it with his camera—clicking away tactfully yet persistently, loading, emptying, loading yet again and, occasionally, helping out his mechanically dim-witted dad. All the while an Eskimo youth of twelve who had become a friend of my son's had been doing his own kind of observations, making his own appraisal of these two characters from afar. At one point the Eskimo lad decided to become somewhat more active in his approach to us and to abandon his posture of the one willing to provide quietly intelligent, good-natured hospitality in favor of a more pointedly instructive manner. His words of advice, or at least some of them, went like this: “Why not put that machine away? Don't worry about what we say! Lots of time we don't talk. We're talking now because you want us to talk! Your son is seeing us; that's what to do. The more you see here, the better you'll know us. We have some snapshots I could show you. If you want, you can make your own snapshots of us. You can take them back home and show us to people. You can take pictures of everyone here, our village [Noorvik], and tell everyone who looks at them that they've visited us, through seeing the pictures. They can see our houses, and our river, and our salmon drying, and our store, and our landing field, and our boats, and most of all, they can see us kids—what we do: going in our school and coming out of it, and playing and hunting and fishing. Then they'll know us, and we won't be strangers—them to us.”

I thought of that child and our Alaskan conversations of years ago as I looked through these photographs of Boston's people and Boston's neighborhoods. I thought, too, of my own work in Boston, done during the late 1960s and early 1970s, when the city was fast changing, becoming no longer only a place where the Irish and the Italians and the Jews lived in a sometimes uneasy peace (along with smaller concentrations of Polish and Greek people, and people from Lithuania, and of course those who lived in Chinatown, and those Protestants from the British Isles who called the Back Bay and Beacon Hill and parts of the Fenway their home). I thought, too, of the research I had done, of the bus rides I had taken to school—with black children from Roxbury going to Beacon Hill well before a federal judge issued his ambitious orders, which have become so significant a part of the city's social history. I was, then, trying to see what those children saw. As with the Eskimo boy, I soon enough heard exactly what those black children saw—a lot. “You go through lots of different places,” one ten-year-old girl told me; then she explained: "There's us, here in Roxbury, then there are the whites who aren't much better off than we are; and then you can see the downtown area, and you can see some people who are really on top, and they look it and they walk it, and if you could hear them talk, I'll bet they'd talk it! My momma told us Boston is lots of cities in one city, just like it was down South where she lived [Atlanta]. You can get yourself an education just by riding the bus, if you keep your eyes open and you sit near the window on the bus, and you really pay attention. You just keep looking, and you keep taking it in."

The "it" was, of course, the diversity of a given metropolis, increasingly witnessed and comprehended by a youngster who may have been having her troubles with a formal course of study, but who was not unable to take stock of what was happening to her native city. And yet, prompted by that ongoing visual experience, she was able to put into words a running commentary about a changing urban scene. Put differently, for this girl, as with the Eskimo boy, the world was something to be absorbed through the eyes, and then fathomed by a mind that gets wonderfully stimulated and provoked through its exposure to the apparent, the evident—to what is in full view. In contrast, alas, is all too often quite another approach—certain thoroughly wordy and abstract presentations that get called, in their sum, "text-books," which have a collective "subject matter": urban sociology, a branch of the social sciences. Lord, we need our language, as it gets applied to this life; and we need our scholars who examine long and hard and closely one or another aspect of humankind. In so doing, they emerge with generalizations and formulations, with theories that (one hopes) become not a testimony to our capacity for idolatry, so much as expressions of our searching and our capacity to explore, conclude, and, not least, have second thoughts. Still, reading and writing are not the only ways to come to terms with life. Nor is resort to verbal speculations, never mind definitive assertions called conclusions, the only way for one to begin to get some much-needed sense of mastery over the people, places, things of this earthly universe of ours.

In City Limits the cameras of certain photographers have been allowed rein, and the result is comparable to what the two children quoted above found available to them—pictures seen through the camera each of us has as our inheritance. A world is witnessed, the sight of a city is captured, engraved engagingly, if not unforgettably: the nuances and the subtleties, the ironies and the ambiguities, the ups and downs of living, the good-natured moments, and, sadly, the times of bad temper, of doubt and scorn and suspicion and hate. Much has happened to Boston in the past half-century, and City Limits casts a sustained and honest glimpse at the consequences of all those events: people of various "sorts and conditions," in the phrase of the Book of Common Prayer, trying as best they can to make do. In a sense, then, the reader about to turn the pages of this book is someone embarking on a wide-ranging contemporary journey: America's oldest city in its newest presence. This is a book in the best tradition of documentary photography, not to mention urban studies: an original, ambitious, and probing expedition into homes and schools and churches and playgrounds and stores, into streets that families reluctantly or casually or proudly call their own, into neighborhoods of several kinds, into Boston as it grows close, indeed, to the onset of the third millennium.

ROBERT COLES

Introduction

Here you will not find the art galleries of Newbury Street, the boutiques of Copley Place, tourists at Faneuil Hall Market, the swan boats of the Public Garden, or an August game at Fenway Park.

We chose not to walk the Freedom Trail.

For nearly eighteen months we tramped through the neighborhoods of Boston, studying their textures and terrain. Our attention was centered on the people who make their homes in the city, play in Healy Park in Roslindale, hang out together after work and before dinner in the Hispanic section of Hyde Square in Jamaica Plain, water plants on the porches of three-deckers in Dorchester, take the rattling Orange Line out to Dudley Station, gather together for rooftop parties on Beacon Hill, serve pasta primavera and luscious cannoli in the North End, shop in Chinatown for foot-long green beans and fresh sea crab, and jog over the crosswalks to the Esplanade and the river.

Boston today is a city of more than 600,000 people. Forty-four percent of its inhabitants are black, Hispanic, or Asian-Pacific islanders. It is a city in which one in every ten residents lives in public housing and whose demographics have changed radically over the past three decades with the exodus of the white middle class, begun in 1950, and the changes wrought by gentrification. In some of its neighborhoods, which are predominantly either black or white, boundaries are struck and racial feelings sometimes bristle. But in others with greater ethnic mix, there is less entrenchment and more opportunity for the normal give and take of people living together in an urban environment.

The city has long been a haven for foreigners. In the early 1880s immigrants began to arrive from Nova Scotia and then from Ireland. They were followed by others from Italy, southern and eastern Europe, and more recently from Vietnam, Cambodia, India, Russia, Czechoslovakia, Puerto Rico, Lebanon, Cape Verde, Laos, Cuba, and Haiti. Today Boston is a multiracial city with strong ethnic communities.

It is a city with an enlightened spirit and an embattled past. The roots of protest go back to pre-revolutionary days and to the Stamp Act, the Tea Party, and the pursuit and harassment of fugitive slaves. Some of its inhabitants have ancestors who crossed the Atlantic in the Mayflower; others were members of the Watch and Ward Society that banned Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn and Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. Some of the people we photographed remember with bitterness the court-ordered desegregation of schools in 1974 and student busing. "It was the worst thing that happened to this city," a woman in Charlestown said. "People used to sit on rooftops with their rifles and wait for the buses." Others marched recently in Chinatown in a fervent protest of police brutality to an Asian refugee.

We were interested in the past only inasmuch as it was reflected in the present. Our work was absorbing; Boston proved to be a hearty, livable city, its people both individual and quite vocal. Whatever one's good will and honest intentions, to photograph is to confront. There were numerous occurrences of welcome and generosity, and memorable extensions of trust. As expected, there were also a few confrontations.

What did we encounter that was unexpected? The visible absence of the middle class—a striking urban phenomenon in America, dramatized in Boston, of rich and poor. We also found neighborhoods that are no longer as communal as once they were when there were Little Mayors and everybody on a block was known by his first name, and when streets could be cordoned off willy-nilly for an important street hockey game.

Although Boston is no longer a city of homogeneous neighborhoods, the people we met and photographed still demonstrate a strong loyalty to various areas in which they live. It is evident that many of them drink at certain neighborhood bars, participate in community festivals, attend the nearby church, and buy most of their groceries around the corner.

Communal feelings in a number of these neighborhoods are engendered in part by shared activities, ethnic rituals, and annual events. They also spring from the camaraderie of older men in Roslindale who have built their own bocce ball court in a city woods, the fleet of women with strollers in Brighton, the Fourth of July parties in Mattapan and on Beacon Hill rooftops, and the cohesive presence all over the city of churches like Roxbury's First Methodist Church and St. Catherine's in Charlestown.

This book is a mosaic of four photographers' visual response to Boston. Centered in the neighborhoods, it depicts urban reality as we saw it—moments of isolation and despair, family communion, public celebration, and private affirmation.

KELLY WISE

1

East Boston

Charlestown

Brighton / Allston

Beacon Hill

North
End

Back Bay

Chinatown

Roxbury

South End

South Boston

Jamaica Plain

Dorchester

Roslindale

Mattapan

West Roxbury

Hyde Park

1

Readville

Roswell Angier East Boston View of Boston from Madonna Queen Shrine, Orient Heights

Bill Burke Dorchester Cricket player, Franklin Field

Bill Burke Dorchester Fields Corner bus station

Bill Burke Beacon Hill Union Boat Club gymnasium

Polly Brown Beacon Hill Boston Athenaeum

Roswell Angier Dorchester Asamblea Cristiana Pentecostal

Roswell Angier East Boston Italian-American War Veterans' Post

Bill Burke Dorchester Family

Bill Burke Dorchester Dorchester Yacht Club

Bill Burke Dorchester New chicken wagon, Codman Square

Bill Burke West Roxbury Mario's Bakery

Polly Brown West Roxbury Irish Social Club party

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Joy Street

Polly Brown Dorchester English High School senior prom, Bayside Exposition Center

Bill Burke Dorchester Guyanese wedding party

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Charles Street

Roswell Angier East Boston Taxi drivers, Maverick Square

Roswell Angier East Boston Car wash

Roswell Angier West Roxbury Spectators at softball game

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Caffè, Charles Street

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Rooftop party

Bill Burke Dorchester Laotian woman

Bill Burke Dorchester Cambodians watching Prince Norodom Saramarith on videotape

Roswell Angier East Boston Housing project

Roswell Angier Beacon Hill Demonstration, State House

Bill Burke Dorchester Church of God of Prophecy

Kelly Wise Beacon Hill Moving day

Roswell Angier East Boston Corner of Maverick and New Streets

Polly Brown West Roxbury St. Patrick's Day party, Stonehedge Nursing Home

Roswell Angier East Boston Rojas family

Bill Burke Beacon Hill Clive Russ, Union Boat Club

2

East Boston

Charlestown

North
End

Beacon Hill

Back Bay

Brighton / Allston

Chinatown

Roxbury

South Boston

South End

Jamaica Plain

Dorchester

Roslindale

Mattapan

West Roxbury

Hyde Park

Readville

Roswell Angier Roxbury Washington Street

Kelly Wise North End Copp's Hill

Kelly Wise Charlestown Reception after chamber music recital

Roswell Angier Charlestown Bunker Hill Day

Kelly Wise Charlestown Condominium conversion

Kelly Wise Roslindale Fence painter

Polly Brown Charlestown Kay Whelan and granddaughter

Roswell Angier Roslindale Carnival

Kelly Wise Charlestown Phipps Burial Ground

Bill Burke Roslindale Hot rod

Roswell Angier North End Hanover Street

Roswell Angier North End Del Bene's Lunch

Roswell Angier North End Richmond Street

Kelly Wise Charlestown Ceremony of the Cross, Good Friday

Kelly Wise Charlestown Reverend Isaiah Sears, First Baptist Church

Polly Brown Roxbury Caribbean carnival

Kelly Wise Charlestown Cleanup, community garden

Kelly Wise Charlestown St. Francis de Sales School

Polly Brown Roxbury Black Nativity rehearsal, Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts

Roswell Angier North End Feast of St. Jude

Polly Brown Roxbury Barber shop

Kelly Wise Charlestown Food distribution day, St. Catherine's School

Roswell Angier North End Bakery

Polly Brown Roxbury Hillside Street, Mission Hill

Bill Burke Roxbury Prentiss Street

Polly Brown Roxbury Mount Pleasant Avenue

Polly Brown Roxbury Carolers, Christmas Eve, Dudley Square

Roswell Angier North End Dedication of Rose Kennedy Garden

Bill Burke Roslindale Dom Uva, West End Gym

Kelly Wise Charlestown Main Street

Polly Brown Roxbury Opening day of Little League season

Polly Brown Roxbury Mission Church, Mission Hill

Roswell Angier North End Caffè Vittoria, Hanover Street

Polly Brown Roxbury Good Friday, Spanish service, Mission Church

Kelly Wise Roslindale James Healy Park

3

Brighton / Allston

Back Bay

Charlestown

East Boston

Beacon Hill

North
End

Chinatown

South End

South Boston

Roxbury

Jamaica Plain

Dorchester

Roslindale

Mattapan

West Roxbury

Hyde Park

Readville

Polly Brown South End Washington Street

Roswell Angier South Boston A Street Lunch

Roswell Angier South Boston L Street Brownies

Kelly Wise Chinatown Tyler Street

Bill Burke Hyde Park Accident

Polly Brown Chinatown Demonstration

Kelly Wise Chinatown Chinatown People's Progressive Association headquarters

Roswell Angier Hyde Park Shoemaker

Kelly Wise Chinatown Near the Chinatown Gate

Kelly Wise South End After Mass, the Cathedral

Polly Brown South End Quinceañera

Polly Brown South End Doña Candida, Villa Victoria Housing Project

Roswell Angier Chinatown Mall, Beach Street

Roswell Angier South End Sunday brunch

Kelly Wise Chinatown Eastern Live Poultry Company

Roswell Angier Readville Hyde Park Avenue

Kelly Wise Chinatown Hing Shing Pastry Shop

Kelly Wise Chinatown In front of Golden Palace Restaurant

Roswell Angier South Boston Soccer game

Polly Brown South End Villa Victoria Plaza

Kelly Wise Chinatown Chinese New Year

Roswell Angier South Boston Lower End Saloon

Polly Brown South Boston Rainbow Coalition Benefit at the Channel

Bill Burke South Boston Intersection of M and Second Streets

Bill Burke South Boston Mary Madden School of Irish Step Dancing

Kelly Wise Chinatown Academy of Chinese Martial Arts

Bill Burke Readville First Communion gift

Roswell Angier Hyde Park Cleary Square

Polly Brown South End Altercation

Kelly Wise Chinatown Dinner party

Polly Brown South End Bob the Chef Restaurant

Polly Brown South End E. Alice Taylor, at 95 the oldest living member of the NAACP, now deceased

Roswell Angier South Boston Lentini-Gibbons Memorial Field

4

Brighton / Allston

Back Bay

Charlestown

East Boston

Beacon Hill

North
End

Chinatown

Roxbury

South End

South Boston

Jamaica Plain

Dorchester

Roslindale

West Roxbury

Mattapan

Hyde Park

Readville

Polly Brown Back Bay Outside the Ritz Carlton Hotel

Roswell Angier Brighton Western Avenue

Bill Burke Jamaica Plain Orange Line from Forest Hills

Roswell Angier Brighton Market Street

Roswell Angier Allston Cambodian household

Polly Brown Mattapan Fourth of July

Polly Brown Back Bay Bastille Day celebration, the French Library

Polly Brown Back Bay Gay Pride Day, Dartmouth Street

Bill Burke Back Bay Kenmore Square

Kelly Wise Jamaica Plain Centre Street, Hyde Square

Bill Burke Jamaica Plain Temple of Santa Barbara

Kelly Wise Jamaica Plain Kazoo band

Polly Brown Jamaica Plain Vietnam Veterans Day parade

Bill Burke Back Bay Ann's Restaurant

Roswell Angier Jamaica Plain Forest Hills Station

Kelly Wise Jamaica Plain Sunbather, Jamaica Pond

Polly Brown Brighton Bodybuilders, Oak Square

Roswell Angier Brighton Dedication of Veronica B. Smith Senior Center

Kelly Wise Back Bay Hemenway Street

Polly Brown Mattapan Haitian soccer players, Almont Park

Kelly Wise Jamaica Plain Playground

Kelly Wise Back Bay Emerson College pier, Charles River

Polly Brown Mattapan Mattapan Square

Bill Burke Jamaica Plain Daughters of St. Paul

Kelly Wise Back Bay Homeless man, Exeter Street

Polly Brown Back Bay Spit, Lansdowne Street

Roswell Angier Back Bay Purim celebration, Chabad House

Roswell Angier Allston Cambodian Buddhist ceremony

Polly Brown Mattapan Williams family, Christmas Eve

FROM THE 1987 PUBLICATION:

Photographs show family celebrations, religious rituals, the homeless, couples, children, bodybuilders, parades, street scenes, and shops in each section of Boston.

This open access digital edition produced by the Northeastern University Library with the generous support of the Humanities Open Book Program, funded by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation and the National Endowment for the Humanities

